Not illustrated. 1860 Excerpt: . . . i H CHAPTER IX. TRIAL AND TEMPTATION. When the little sparrow which nestled in the honeysuckle under Lucys window sounded the first note of his matin song, she awoke from the heavy, unrefreshing slumber into which she had fallen; and, as she sat gloomy and thoughtful, she remembered a verse in the Bible, which read, Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. And then she thought that Jesus was inviting the sorrowstricken and distressed to come to him for assistance. She was very willing to come now; she was ready to acknowledge her utter helplessness; and she thought she could never forgive herself for making so many vain boasts of being out of danger of falling into sin, when she was entirely under its bondage. She desired more than any thing else to escape from her own deceitful thoughts and to possess a clear conscience before God. It was not grief for the death of little Charlie which oppressed her now: it was sorrow for her sins, for her resistance to the dominion of her Lord and Saviour. It was not likely that any one of her friends could comfort her, for father is poor, but I would not give up my chance for pleasure for any such nonsense; and I know, if I had your situation, I would not lightly part with it. If I have parted with these pleasures, Janie, it is not without thinking seriously of...
